Chapter 1 by Ji Won Kim

Blank.

Bright.

Blinding.

Something wasn't right. He wasn't supposed to be here...not here. Stained, slack straps hung onto the wrists of the man sprawled on the operating table. His body had been carved open by a professional - right in half. His ribs and organs were still intact to his relief but the fact that he was lying there, vulnerable as the next meat to be hacked into, was unnerving.

With great agility, the man ripped off the harnesses and wrapped his lifeless skin over his organs like a security blanket: "Can't live without those." His apprehensive eyes scanned the room; it was spacious but barren. There were no windows that decorated the walls and more importantly, there was no door for him to escape through.

"Just how in the hell did I get here?" the man muttered. The last thing he remembered doing
